IV 次のグラフとそれに続く説明文の内容に合致するように、下の問1～問5の質問に対する答えとして最も適切なものを、下の①～④の中から一つ選び、その番号で答えなさい。

Some jobs are more dangerous than others. The above chart shows the number of deaths in the top ten most dangerous jobs in America for 2016. There are two ways to measure these deaths. The first is the total number of workers who died in each job (the right axis). The second is the proportion of workers who were killed (the left axis). This is usually measured as the number of workers per 100,000.

The two most dangerous jobs in 2016 were logging (cutting down trees) and fishing. 91 and 24 people died in each industry respectively. As both of these are fairly small industries, the rates were 135.9 and 86 deaths per 100,000 workers. Roofers were fourth with a total of 101 deaths, and about 49 deaths per 100,000. The highest number of deaths was amongst truckers and drivers, at 918, or 24.7 deaths per 100,000. The only two other jobs to have over 200 deaths were farm workers and grounds workers (people who work in gardens, parks and so on).

Jobs that fortunately didn't make it onto the list include police and fire fighters — jobs typically seen as dangerous. One job in particular we don't normally think of as dangerous was in the top ten — trash collectors. In fact, 31 collectors died, or just over 34 deaths per 100,000 workers.

V 次の文章を読み、後の問いに答えなさい。

The other day, I was catching a train from Paddington Station. I got there really early, so I bought a newspaper and went to a coffee shop. I bought a cup of coffee. I (1) bought a pack of chocolate chip and nut biscuits. The coffee shop was a bit full, but there was an empty chair at a table in the corner. I went there, put my biscuits, coffee and newspaper on the table and sat down.

Sitting across from me was another man in a dark gray business suit. He was drinking a cup of tea and reading a newspaper. He looked quite normal, with a friendly face. He didn't look like he would do anything out of the ordinary. He didn't look at me, he completely (4) ignored me. That suited me fine. I just wanted to have a quiet cup of coffee, read my newspaper and enjoy my biscuits (2) I waited for my train.

Then, something strange happened. The ordinary-looking man across from me reached over and opened my pack of biscuits. He didn't look up, didn't say anything. The man had opened my pack of biscuits as if they were his own. I was stunned, outraged and angry. I was a normal, adult English man, and there was only one way to respond. I took a sip of my coffee and, as calmly as I could, and without looking up from my newspaper, I took one of the biscuits. And then I ate it. Slowly. I enjoyed every bite of it. It was delicious.

And then something extraordinary happened. The man sitting across from me reached over and, without looking up from his newspaper, took a biscuit. And, without looking at me once, he took a bite. And another, and another and another, until the whole biscuit was (3). I was (5) speechless, frozen, shocked. It was as if he had slapped me in the face. Fortunately, I knew exactly what to do. Without shaking, I reached over and took another biscuit. This time, to be honest, it didn't taste as good. These were no longer biscuits — they were the prize in a battle of wills. And it was a never ending battle, as the man, without sweating or blinking, took another biscuit. It felt as if this back and forth went on forever, but it stopped when the last biscuit in the pack of six was eaten.

And then, before either of us could say anything, a train announcement could be heard from outside the coffee shop. The man, without looking at me, quickly folded his newspaper, grabbed his bag and left the shop. He didn't even look over his shoulder as he left.

I sat there barely breathing, knowing that somehow I had survived a great battle, and sure that I had won a great victory. After a couple of minutes, I could hear my train being announced. I gathered up my bag and newspaper, and stood up to go. And there, on the table under where my newspaper had been, was my pack of chocolate and nut biscuits, unopened.
